First and foremost, thank you for reviewing this comment.

Only just yesterday I had a conversation, as I've typically come to expect, about the direction this country is taken. And speaking as a patriot it would be devastating to leave my home, and cease giving back to the communities that provided for me growing up. I take pride in having made it my mission to help those around me, as best I can. In this conversation I stated clearly that other countries have it worse, North Korea being an obvious choice.

But here I am living close to Canada and wondering more and more if - for the safety of my family - it might become necessary to immigrate. The news frequently terrifies me whether it's government corruption, discriminatory legislation, emboldened hate group, or let's face it - yet another innocent unarmed civilian being killed by law enforcement. It's natural to be worried, and uncertain, but it's also exhausting.

I have mixed feelings about online communication, having seen it as a tool to abuse and terrorize others. But I also consider it one of the last bastions of education, innovation, and frankly progression. I am concerned that abolishing Net Neutrality will make it all the easier for citizens to see their freedoms lessened, questioned, or outright halted.

Please consider this moving forward, and thank you again.

-Justin